Florida is still enforcing a relic of the War on Drugs: automatic driver’s license suspensions for anyone convicted of a drug offense. While most states have opted-out of the federal law which created these automatic suspensions, Florida suspends more than 24,000 driver’s licenses annually for drug offenses unrelated to driving. Driver’s license suspensions for non-driving offenses are indefensible: they are bad policy, waste government resources, and further disadvantage people convicted of drug crimes.

License suspensions for non-driving offenses don’t work.

- The American Association of Motor Vehicles found that there is ‘no evidence’ that non-driving suspensions deter criminal behavior.
- Nevertheless, non-driving suspensions are added on top of harsh existing criminal penalties for drug convictions.

License suspensions waste taxpayer dollars and traffic safety officials’ time.

- Forcing traffic authorities to focus on non-driving suspensions instead of driving-related behavior undermines public safety.
- In 2010, Florida’s Department of Highway Safety spent $72,314 on paper, envelopes, and postage for the sole purpose of corresponding with people whose licenses were suspended for non-driving reasons.
- In Washington state, punishing drivers who continue to drive after their driver’s license was suspended for non-driving reasons consumes 70,000 hours a year in patrol officer time.

License suspensions make finding and keeping a job harder.

- Public transportation is often not a reasonable alternative for low-income people who bear the brunt of these license suspensions. For example in Palm Bay, Lakeland, Orlando, and the Tampa metropolitan areas, 80% of jobs are not reasonably accessible via public transit for people living in low-income communities.
- This policy leaves thousands of people without access to economic opportunities. A New Jersey study found that 40% of people lost their job upon having their driver’s license suspended and 88% reported lower income.

Read the full report at www.prisonpolicy.org/driving/national